Human Rights Education and Good Governance

Sanchita Bora & Ranjana Borah

INTRODUCTION

In every culture and civilization it has remained a basic concept that dignity and equality of each member should be valued. The fact is that being human essentially means possessing some rights. Harold J Laski says, "Rights are those conditions of social life without which no man can develop his innate potential to the fullest." These rights are necessary for all round development of personality and progress of an individual. Such rights are moral claims, most popularly known as Human Rights which are inherent and inalienable in all human individuals. But, in the course of history, human life and human dignity have been disregarded and thereby human rights are violated. So, a conducive and enabling environment must ensure the implementation of human rights. There arises the paramount necessity of machinery to protect these rights. Evidently this
